Abstract

Economic activities require funds being arranged through various sources such as own funds, borrowings, issue of securities, etc. Among securities, equity shares are issued in the capital markets. Bombay Stock Exchange is one of the capital markets where equity shares are traded. Investors frequently trade in such equity shares of their choice. Hence, numerous trading frequencies take place in a trading day. Trading frequencies influence on share price change during a trading day. Thus, the lower the trading frequency, the lower are share price changes. The main objective of this study is to examine the impact of low frequency trading on share price change during January, 2020 to May, 2020. The required secondary data was collected from www.bseindia.com. Analysis and interpretation are done to test a hypothesis that low frequency trading has negative impact on share price change. The results revealed that low frequency trading had negative impact as well as positive impact on share price change on BSE 30 companies. The study suggests that more variables may be covered for a future study.

Key words: Bombay Stock Exchange, BSE 30 Companies, Capital Market, Equity Market, Low Frequency Trading, Share Price Change.

1. Introduction

Bombay Stock Exchange (BSE) is a capital market where the listed securities are traded. BSE was established in 1875 and it is Asia's oldest stock exchange. BSE is the world's 10th largest stock exchange with an overall capitalization of more than Rs 1,27,06,528.94 Crore as on 31-05-2020. Numerous trading frequencies take place in a trading day. One buys shares when market opens and sells them on the same trading day to gain profits or holds shares to next day or week or month. There are three factors involved in securities trading namely trading frequencies, share price change and number of shares traded. Here, trading frequencies are considered as independent variable whereas share price change

Abstract

The Internet of Things refers to the linking of non-living items to the Internet, allowing them to communicate information in order to automate human work. Sensors, actuators, and processors are implanted in the objects, which interact with one another to perform certain tasks. The properties of IOT (Internet of Things) and its architecture are discussed in this article. It also examines the Internet of Things' uses and potential problems, as well as its benefits and drawbacks.

Keywords – IOT, Internet of Things, Sensors, Actuators, Processors

1. Introduction

With the introduction of the Internet, a large number of computers were linked together to form the World Wide Web. Later, mobile devices gained Internet access, resulting in the emergence of social networks that were very popular among the general public. The idea of linking non-living items to the Internet was eventually introduced ^[1], resulting in a new technology known as the Internet of Things.

The Internet of Things-IoTs facilitates the linking of digital & physical items through the use of valuable communications technology & provides a future vision in which computing systems, users, & objects collaborate for convenience & economic rewards. One such goal needs seamless security, data protection, authentications, & attacks resistance. Blockchain-BC, a distributed ledger that keeps an immutable log of networks transactions, could establish such characteristics. In this article, we give a complete assessment of methods to redesign blockchain-BC to particular Internet of Things demands in addition to construct Blockchain-BC based Internet of Things (BIoT) applications, with the goal of forming a cohesive picture of current state-of-the-art efforts in this regard. Following a description of the fundamental features & requirements of Internet of Things, the evolution of blockchain-BC is outlined. In this context, we begin with blockchains-BC's core operating principles as well as how such networks accomplish auditability, security, & decentralisation. Furthermore, we discuss the most relevant BIoT applications, as well as their architecture design & security issues. From there, they develop our story around the centralised Internet - of - things difficulties, following by recent advances in tackling them. Lastly, some future directions were listed in order to guide future BIoT researchers on the issues that must be addressed before to launching the next generation of BIoT applications.

2. Literature survey:

Both Cloud Computing-CC & the Internet of Things-IoT were emerging platforms with promising futures. Internet of Things relies heavily on cloud computing-CC, which is built on

Abstract

Advancement in Information and Technology sector has brought about the unique transformation in development process of Indian economy consisting of several sectors including banking sector per se cooperative banks. These banks play a significant role in the economic development process of the country. Information and Technology sector has revolutionized the internet banking service for the hassle-free conduct of banking operations. Hence, there is a need of the hour to adopt internet banking service in cooperative banks to cope up with fast-changing scenario and to ensure financial feasibility of their operations for the perpetual sustenance. However, there are several challenges in adopting internet banking service in cooperative banks in India. The main objective of the present study is to discuss selective challenges of adoption of internet banking service in cooperative banks in India. The limitation of study is that the discussion is restricted only to selective challenges of adoption of internet banking service in cooperative banks in India. Suitable suggestions are offered for adoption of internet banking in cooperative banks in India in the years to come.
